Goldin-Meadow S, Brentari D. gesture, sign, and language: The coming age of sign language and sign language studies. Behav Brain Sci. 2017;40:e46. doi:10.1017/S0140525X15001247 My native language is Dutch. I write and read mostly in English for my work (you look at this), hobbies (my personal blog and news addiction) and research. Of course, I like to improve my English all the time. Now you can take lessons to improve your language skills, but I think it's a great opportunity to work on your skills while you're reading or writing something. There is a big gap between just learning and really mastering the language, and that's one of the things that can help achieve great results. I actually used to notepad files with some of the words that I looked at over time, so I can review them once in a while. It's a time-tested way to improve your language skills. I'll show you how to use Google Translate and new ones for that. Google Translate has been around for quite some time now and you probably know it or used it. It can be used to translate words, paragraphs, or entire documents or web pages. This is especially useful in my case for reading news or blogs that sometimes have the ability to translate a page so I can understand what it's about better. If the page doesn't have this built-in, you can always copy and paste the text into Google Translate, but there are also browser plugins to automatically translate the page. Good for Firefox is gTranslate. While this will help you understand foreign texts and therefore help you improve your language skills, the core of the system I suggest today is repetition. See words you didn't know before. If you're just going to see them once, you won't know them well enough to use them yourself. This is where Google's new dictionary service comes in. This is another example of Google handing out a service for free where other companies will charge, show ads or both. The Google Dictionary also very much puts the genre of dictionary websites upside down. We're probably going to benefit the most end users, so let's welcome our new Google overlords to this. Google's dictionary supports 12 languages and 16 more languages that can only be translated. Now just start looking for any word you're not sure about. Even if you think you know, you know, the word means, but not that the translation is accurate, look it out. Google's dictionary makes it easy to save (or as Google calls it a star) any word you've searched for. Then review the words you have saved periodically, maybe once a week or every month. Words first appear without their meaning, so you honestly check whether you know the meaning of the word. When you find that you have memorized the meaning correctly, you can remove the word from the list. Once you have learned to look for any word you don't know by heart, you begin to improve your language skills. This principle of continuous improvement, which the Japanese call kaisen, can be the basis of great change. It falls into the same category as a fall that hollowed out stone over time or a great journey that done step by step. Are you trying to learn a different language than your native language? The traditional process of building a family is by getting pregnant and raising that child as most people build their family image. When a family is presented that has been created differently, people often unknowingly use harmful or hurtful languages. But words matter! Over the past few decades, the language used to discuss adoption has changed significantly. This is partly due to changes in the process, as well as to the realization that the words we choose can harm people. Those who participate in adoption often have a certain degree of patience in answering questions because of good intentions for questions or because they want to take the opportunity to educate others. However, some things will offend without intending. Read on to get a dictionary of things you should start saying and things you should completely avoid when it comes to adoption. An approved dictionary of the language of acceptance is said to be placed for adoption. To say that a woman stands up, surrendered or gave her child for adoption is a very outdated terminology that humiliates everyone in the process, especially the child. For legal reasons, the birth of a mother is often reimbursed for the cost of having a child, and adoptive parents pay professionals to help them through the adoption process. But the use of the old terms makes the child look like a product at auction. In addition, this language is the language that the birth mom doesn't want her child's parent. Often nothing is further from the truth. Usually she wanted more than anything to be able to provide for her child, but she knew she just wasn't able to do it. If you want to learn about the process, asking about how the child has been placed on adoption is much kinder and expresses curiosity rather than degradation. If you need to distinguish, use a parent of birth and a foster parent. When there is no need to distinguish between two, it is appropriate to simply refer to foster parents as parents. However, if you are asking questions about the birth of your parents, these are the terms you should use. Never use adjectives such as real or own or natural. In addition, it is rarely necessary to distinguish a child as an adopted child. He or she is just their child. Use terms such as planning and decision when asking expectant mothers questions about their child's potential placement. Often, women who are in the process of deciding whether to adopt a child often hear very polarizing language. Here are some things to remember. The child is not illegitimate. He or she is born to unmarried parents. Similarly, the child is not an unwanted or problematic pregnancy. More like an unintended pregnancy. A woman does not decide to give or give up. She draws up an adoption plan or chooses adoption. And the woman does not decide whether to keep the child. She decides if she is going to the child's parents. A woman doesn't put her child up for adoption. She puts the child up for adoption or in the process of finding a family for the parents of her child. Language and questions to avoid never say the word real. Often foster mothers are asked about the real mother of their child. These may be innocent questions because people do not know how to express their curiosity, but it is important to realize the real meaning of the word. This means that the adoptive mother is in some way unreal or imaginary. When used to ask about the birth of a mother, it makes the foster mother feel disadvantaged. Eventually, through the adoption process, she became the legal mother of the child. Implying that the birth of a mother is the only real mom can be incredibly harmful. Similarly, mothers often feel guilty when they are quantified as the real mother when they are not raising a child. With open adoptions today, birth mothers are often associated with the foster family to some extent. Adoption can create a beautiful and intertwined parental love that should not be reduced by the word real. Do not use words such as surrender or put up. The wording suggests that the mother got rid of the child because she did not want him or her. Also, never ask a birth mom why she doesn't want her baby or why the birth mother doesn't want a baby. This is a very personal matter and makes what is most likely the wrong assumption. This is not only offensive, but also complex factors that are included in each adoption decision. Almost every birth mother wanted her child and would love to be able to parent, but for a variety of reasons chose adoption as the best option for her child. Avoid asking what happens if the birth mother decides she wants the baby back. This issue is harmful to both adoptive parents and parents. The adoption process is established in such a way that there are many stages of decision-making and extensive legal measures. The expectant mother carefully chooses the foster family and signs parental rights to them. After signing the documents, sometimes there is a short amount of time for the birth of the mother to change your mind, sometimes not. But by the time she gets on the paperwork, the expectant mother will carefully weigh her options. Of course, there are horror stories in the news with guardianship battles, but they are quite rare. Asking this question creates an untested fear in the minds of adoptive parents. Worse, if the child is old enough to understand the issue (but not necessarily the legal realities of adoption), it can create a huge anxiety for them in wondering if their family is really permanent. Do not ask any questions about how much the child costs and how much money the mother has received. The adoption process does not consist of adoptive parents going to the child's store and choosing the child. There's no price tag. No matter how you grow your family, having a baby is expensive. Think about doctor appointments and hospital bills that come with pregnancy. Adoptive parents simply pay for having a child's costs differently and with different terms compared to the cost of having a child. The birth of a mother does not receive a check he made to buy her child. He or she is not an object. In some pregnancy-related situations medical bills and/or living expenses are subsidized, but this is the only way that it is not worth the birth of the mother anything to place the child up for adoption. Never tell adoptive parents that they will probably get pregnant after their adoption. Many people take families who adopt because they can't get pregnant, but that's not always the case. And even if it was because they couldn't get pregnant traditionally, this comment is insensitive because they've gone through a tough attempt to get pregnant. Foster parents probably researched and agonized over all their options before coming to this decision. In a not-so-subtle way, this statement implies that acceptance is the second best, and that they should be happy because they can still achieve their original and better goal. Also, it's just flat out wrong. Statistically, those who took no more likely to get pregnant than those who did not. It's just one big myth. Remember that your words matter. With a little thought and effort, you can show support and curiosity, not inadvertently offend those who were part of the taking. ###### Witt is the owner of Adoption Counseling, an impartial resource serving pre-foster families, providing them with education, information and advice that they should safely adopt a newborn, usually within three to 12 months.
